IN THE ORCHARD.

Mulching Trees With Protection Against Mice.
The system of mulching employed by the Rural New Yorker, as explained to one of its correspondents, is here given:

With us mulching the young tree means piling weeds, grass or any trash that will decay around the base of the tree. We cannot do this and feel sure that the mice will not work there unless we do this to wrap a small sheet of wire cloth around the lower trunk of the tree, pushing it lightly into the soil and fastening by looping over the edges or putting wire around it. This keeps off mice and also prevents some of the work of borers. Another method is to fasten off thin strips of wood or veneer to the lower trunk. We have not protected many trees in this way, and in late November we go over the orchard, push the mulch away from the tree and make a mound of earth around the base by throwing several spadefuls of earth and pressing it down. With this method we have had but little trouble with mice.

An Advantage in Winter.
The plan of protecting the trees is better, for then the mulch can be left around the trees all winter, an advantage, we are sure. Whenever we have been able to obtain enough mulching material this plan has given us as good results as cultivation. The trouble with us is to obtain all the mulch we need. We consider it better to cut the grass or weeds, rake and pile under the trees as far out as the branches extend. We throw it up against the trunks of the trees. Although reports are sent to us of cases where mice have done great damage in summer, they have only injured us in winter. It is much safer to protect the trees. We know from experience that it takes courage to try this or any other new plan which is opposed to general practice.

Some Experience.
Our experience shows that there are few more foolish things than planting a tree in soil and then letting it alone without culture or mulch, cutting the grass and taking it away for hay, yet many of the arguments against the mulch method seem to be based on the results of such an experiment. It would be almost as foolish to put a thick mulch around an unprotected tree and leave it there for the entire year. The mice will nest under the mulch and gnaw the tree unless something harder than their teeth is put around it.

A little work on most of the above Coats would make them worth to you more than double what they will now cost you.
